Van examines endorsements by special interest groups

Endorsements by individuals can be a sign of confidence and respect. However, endorsements by special interest groups are on my opinion a down payment on the candidate's integrity. There is only one endorsement I am interested in; that is your endorsement on election day.

Special interest endorsements, especially when accompanied or followed up with a contribution to the candidate's election campaign, come with strings, ropes, and chains. It is the epidemy of a classic quid pro quo relationship. In exchange for a public endorsement or campaign contribution, the special interest group expects and will eventually demand cooperation from the candidate to introduce or support legislation that favors them or their friends. In the mind of a special interest group an endorsement of a campaign contribution is an investment in the candidate with an expected return on that investment. After the election, the candidate, who is now an elected official, has little choice but to do what's asked because if they don't, they will lose the support of the group and face possible rejection in the next election. Beware of candidates who have been endorsed by special interest groups!

I have, not nor will I accept, special interest campaign endorsements or donations. The only donations I will accept are amounts donated by individual voters such as yourself. When I enter the Senate, I will owe no special interest group for my election. I want no political debts to pay in the form of "my cooperation".
